

CONTENTS

NOTE FROM THE PRESIDENT Christopher T. Gates	293
The American Communities Movement John T. Kesler, Drew O'Connor Results of a recent nationwide study of community movements indicate important areas of convergence in terms of tools, values, and practices. The coordinators of the study summarize some of its findings and highlight the emergence of a new phase in the development of the civic sector.	295
Civic Gemstones: The Emergent Communities Movement Tyler Norris One of the foremost practitioners in the healthy community movement in the United States reflects on facets of the emergent communities movement and identifies some of the principles and practices that can serve as the foundation for future developments.	307
Linking Civic Engagement and Community Improvement: A Practitioner Perspective on the Communities Movement David Swain The associate director of Jacksonville Community Council, Inc., in Florida presents a comprehensive assessment of the challenges and choices confronting community improvement projects.	319
Investment-Based Business Plans for Human Service Delivery: A New Model Takes Shape in Des Moines, Iowa Becky Miles-Polka Using research indicating that well-timed and well-targeted social investments produce significant positive returns, the Human Services Planning Alliance in Des Moines has developed a new model for human service delivery.	335
Community Indicators: Past, Present, and Future Randa Gahin, Chris Paterson Interest in indicators is on the rise. This article offers a context for assessing the history of their use and presents lessons learned, as well as evaluation of current examples of community indicator projects.	347
Healthy Communities: Beyond Civic Virtue Ken Jones, Jennifer Colby Local-level action by nongovernmental actors is increasingly important in realizing national policy goals. Increased coordination and communication and better integration of responsibilities among local community programs and state and federal agencies are required to make these collaborative efforts successful.	363

- Citizen Participation and Democracy: Examples in Science and Technology 375
Jill Chopyak
Community-based research movements are broadening the research agenda as citizen activists participate in generating information to guide decision making in the areas where they live.
- Sustainable Communities and the Future of Community Movements 385
Susan F. Boyd
A leading member of the sustainable community movement offers a perspective on the development of a communities movement.
- The New Public Service: Putting Democracy First 391
Robert B. Denhardt, Janet V. Denhardt
The reinventing government movement and the new public management have been among the most prominent perspectives in the ongoing debate over the changing role of government. The authors underscore the importance of democratic values and herald the significance of the new public service.